

Abstract

The invention concerns a method for protecting metal-containing structures, in particular electrically conductive structures, deposited on a substrate, against corrosive attacks, in particular electrocorrosion attacks. Said method is characterized in that it consists in applying at least temporarily to the structure a passivation electric voltage in the passivation range of the conductive material concerned.